A Theatrical Treat.

It is not often that the theatregoers of this city are permitted to see a treat in a theatrical way as will be given them by the presentation here by Henry B. Harris of one of the greatest plays ever produced in America, "The Lion and the Mouse."

The play is by Charles Klein, author of "The Music Master." It deals with the money interests and politics of the country adverse to social welfare. John Burkett Ryder, the octopus of his time in a financial way, in order to the better win his ends in the amassing of the greatest fortune ever controlled by a single man, resorts to means to unseat a judge of the supreme court who has rendered decision unfavorable to his schemes by intentionally discrediting a position held in the highest esteem by the people of his own country. While Ryder is the leader of men and rules the financial situation, treading every man's opinion under his golden heels, he is thwarted in his plans by a girl, the daughter of this judge. The play is one of vital interest, picturing realistically and truthfully the political and financial situation of the present day.

The seat sale is announced for Wednesday evening at seven o'clock.
